

Pete Hegseth Renames The Pentagon

U.S. Secretary of Defense Pete Hegseth poured another drink from his half-empty bottle, turned his attention from placement of his next tattoo to rehearsing for the forthcoming Congressional hearing, and read aloud from his notes...

“To a man our brave and lethal American fighting men (No ma’am we did not ask the fighting ladies for their opinions) have insisted that we boost their morale by restoring base names in remembrance of the Confederate generals who killed so many of their Brothers in Blue during the historic Civil War.”

In his mind’s eye Secretary Hegseth envisioned his Congressional enemies dumbstruck by the lethal eloquence of his argument, then continued. “What other son of the American colonies has ever led a suicide charge so glorious as that of General George Pickett on the last day of Gettysburg? Gettysburg. Wow! Pickett sure does deserve to have his lethal name on a fort.”

Secretary Hegseth made a mental note that his next tattoo should be General Pickett, sword in hand, leading the charge up Cemetery Ridge. Then he went back to his notes.

“And who knew better how to keep our Black brothers and sisters in line than slaveholders like Robert E. Lee and Braxton Bragg and Nathan Bedford Forrest? We must free our lethal military from DEI nonsense and restore these lethal leaders’ names to their forts.” In his mind’s eye Secretary Hegseth visualized amazement on the faces of Congressional representatives who had clearly never thought of things this way.

Secretary Hegseth took another sip of his drink and looked over his roster of other great military commanders who had played such a memorable role in shaping the lethality of today’s lethal killing machine and who also deserved to have their lethal names emblazoned on an American military facility.

At the top of Secretary Hegseth’s list was Admiral Isoroku Yamamoto, without whom Americans would not celebrate Pearl Harbor Day every December 7. To make sure we never forget that Day of Infamy, Secretary Hegseth determined to rename Naval Station Pearl Harbor Port Yamamoto.

Knowing that the greatness of a military commander is determined by the greatness of his enemies and that without Field Marshal Erwin Rommel, General George Patton would be a footnote of history, Secretary Hegseth determined to rename Fort Irwin (whoever that was) in California’s Mojave Desert Fort Desert Fox, a sexier name for his lethal desert commandos.

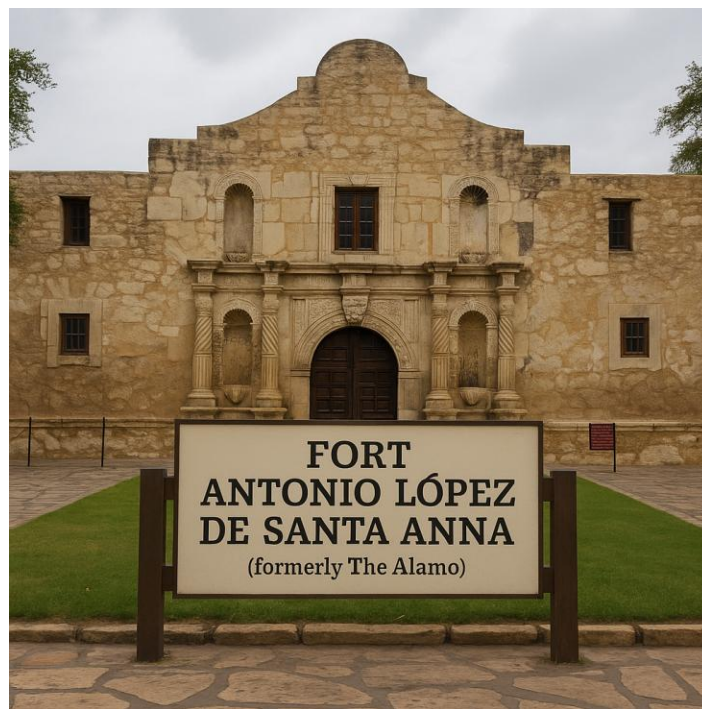

To help us remember the Italian campaign of World War II, Secretary Hegseth determined to rename the Armed Forces Recruiting Station in Times Square, almost next door to Little Italy, Fort Kesselring, the German Field Marshal who did so much to get Italy out of the war by killing so many Italians.

In appreciation of the fact that many of his boss’s staunchest supporters hailed from the Lone Star State, Secretary Hegseth decided to rename The Alamo Fort Antonio López de Santa Anna, the Mexican general without whom that Texas shrine would be just another decrepit old mission building forgotten by time.

But why stop with just military bases? Secretary Hegseth smiled at the brilliance of this lethal new insight. Didn't we also need to be reminded of the people who toughened us up from the inside? He poured another drink as his warrior mind raced across the battlefield of possibilities.

In Birmingham Alabama he would rename Martin Luther King Jr. Drive Bull Conner Freeway in remembrance of the lawman who had a thing or two to teach the weak liberal law enforcers of Blue American cities about how to handle a mob with fire hoses and attack dogs.

Secretary of Defense Pete Hegseth polished off his bottle and drifted off to sleep into his recurring wet dream of the Big Beautiful Parade that would celebrate renaming The Pentagon to Fort Pete Hegseth in honor of his loyal service to Commander-in-Chief-for-Life Corporal Bonespur.

Remember the Fort Antonio López De Santa Anna!
